THE WHITE LIONS OF TIMBAVATI

PROPHECY

Teaching: More elusive than the African leopard, rarer than the legendary snow leopard of the Himalayas, and as white as the polar bear of Alaska, rumors of the existence of pure White Lions have existed in the African oral tradition for centuries. But there is only one place on earth where they have actually materialized—the Timbavati region bordering South Africa’s Kruger National Park. While reports of White Lions first surfaced in the 1930s, scientists were not able to officially document their existence until 1975.

Used to looking for spiritual signs in nature, African elders see the White Lions’ arrival in the wilderness as the fulfilment of an ancient prophecy indentifying these majestic creatures as angelic messengers from God. In spiritual terms their white coloring represents purity and enlightenment, beyond all racial connotations. White is sunlight and contains all the colors of the spectrum in one; white is beyond color, creed, race, or gender, and therefore is the perfect icon for South Africa’s rainbow nation and a unifying symbol across world cultures

Indeed, African elders believe that the White Lions are the most sacred animals on the African continent and are here to deliver a sacred message for humanity at this time of crisis. As an apex predator, the lion is viewed as the true guardian of the land, while the White Lion, in particular, is believed to be the King of Kings, an angelic guardian presiding over this sacred site and playing a vitally important role in the sensitive ecology of the region (and the whole world). For many centuries, African kings identified the land of Timbavati as a protected area; its name “Tsimba-vaati” is derived from the ancient Shangaan language and means “the place where star-lions came down from the heavens.”

Linda Tucker, Keeper of the White Lions

Linda's story:

Sitting round the campfire in the African bush with my sister and our friends, we drank beer while we watched the burning embers shooting sparks into the starlit darkness. My safari holiday to Timbavati, on the edge of South Africa's Kruger National Park, seemed like the perfect antidote to my frenetic life in London. Back home, I worked long hours as an account manager at an advertising agency, having recently given up my career as a model for Yardley and L'Oreal. It was the primal sound of roaring lions that drew us deeper into the bush that night in November 1991. The spirit of the legendary rare white lions had haunted the Timbavati bushveld for centuries.

Now, our game ranger, Leonard, wanted to show us a tawny pride of lions that he believed might still carry the white gene and therefore had the potential to produce white cubs. From the urgent, exuberant tone the lions were making that night, Leonard was convinced that a lioness might have given birth, so we headed off into the darkness hoping to catch a glimpse of a white cub.

At the very moment that we picked out the glowing amber eyes of a large lion, there was a rasping sound from our open-topped vehicle and it came to a shuddering halt. The agitated lions were too close for comfort. In the headlights I glimpsed shadowy shapes and caught the outline of a snarling lioness. The last thought in our minds at that point was whether she might have any white cubs. As Leonard jammed the gears into reverse to make a speedy exit, the vehicle jolted violently. A tree trunk had got caught under the front axle, breaking the steering column. We were stuck.

Stranded and unprotected in the midst of angry lions, we waited. I was terrified and my legs felt like jelly. A fully-grown lion crouched not ten metres away, eyes fiery with rage. Leonard ordered us to keep calm. 'If you run, the lions will bring you down,' he said. Reassuring us that he had his rifle, Leonard told us to just 'sit tight'. There followed a horrible, petrified silence.

But then, out of the blackness, a ghostly presence came towards us. It was an old woman and, unbelievably, she carried a baby on her back. Behind her followed a young girl and a wide-eyed youth. In a trance-like state, each holding on to the other, they silently clambered into the Land Rover, sitting among us like phantoms. There they stared blankly into the darkness, into the field of lions from which they had come.

It's hard to explain the impact this woman had on our group - because all of a sudden complete calmness descended and my sister's boyfriend, Andries, announced that he was going to walk the mile or so back to camp to retrieve the other vehicle and save us all.

With a look of determination in his eyes, he pushed past the old lady and grabbed the youth saying, 'Come on, let's go'. He assumed the young man could show him the route and they set off, fearlessly walking through the lions, while we sat in the Land Rover, too stunned to speak.

As we watched their figures disappear into darkness, I tried not to think about what lay ahead for them. After waiting for what seemed like hours - although it was nearer 45 minutes - another Land Rover emerged from the bush. Miraculously, Andries had passed unharmed through the lion-infested darkness and had come back to rescue us.

When I returned to London I tried to put the events of that night out of my mind, but I kept thinking about this mysterious woman and how she had transformed our fear into courage. I struggled on for three years, but the material world of advertising seemed trivial and soulless. So, feeling utterly exhausted by my life, I gave up my job, sold my house and returned to South Africa, determined to find out as much as I could about the woman who had saved us.

Living in a hut in Timbavati, I exchanged my designer suits and heels for jeans and boots. Even though my friends and family thought I was crazy, they knew I had to do this. It didn't take long to find the mysterious woman. Her name was Maria Khosa and she was a 'lion shaman' and a renowned sangoma, or medicine woman.

When we met again, she told me how she had heard our panic-ridden shouts in the darkness that night and come to our aid. She explained that the lion was not an enemy but a guardian spirit. Over the next six years, I spent as much time as I could with Maria, getting to know her, learning how important it was to love and respect nature - and the white lions formed a huge part of that teaching. To the tribal elders, they are sacred animals, but hunting has meant they had died out in the wild.

Maria told me that I would be sent a sign to show me what I had to do next. I was somewhat disbelieving, but then I heard from a friend about a white lioness cub that had been born in a 'canned' hunting camp in a town called Bethlehem, in South Africa's Free State province, on Christmas Day. It was the only sign I needed - I knew then that I would not rest until I had freed this cub and brought her to Timbavati.

* And so for Linda this was the beginning of a dharma of rescuing these white lions and freeing them to have their own home in Timbavati. You can read more about her and her mission at: <http://www.whitelionshomeland.org/>

The Story of Queen Numbi

In the heart of Africa, within the Kruger National Park in South Africa is a private game reserve called Timbavati.

Timbavati is the home of many of South Africa's greatest animals, but it is most well known for a one of the rarest creatures of all – the white lion.

The folklore of the local Shangaan people have for hundreds of years spoken of how these creatures came to be.

Four hundred odd years ago there lived a mighty queen. Not only was she queen, but also a great spiritual person and the Rain Queen of her people. She was known as Queen Numbi, the ugly. Although ugly in appearance, her people loved and respected her and when illness struck, feared for her life.

According to legend, Numbi's legs and stomach swelled up and she was running a fever. Modern medicine tells us that this could have been a condition called 'Elephantitis' which could have been caused by Malaria. As Queen Numbi got closer and closer to death, her people prayed to the ancestral spirits for help and healing. For months nothing happened and Queen Numbi got worse.

One day, when Queen Numbi was extremely close to death and her followers were at their wit's end, night fell and the stars started appearing. Suddenly one star grew bigger than the rest. As the people gazed upwards, the star got closer and closer. It is said that the animals in the bush started making a huge noise when the star got near.

People started shouting:

"Timbi le!", "It has come down!"

"Timbi le vaa ti!", "It has come down to the ground!"

Slowly the bright light floated down before touching down not far from the hut of the great Queen.

With her servants helping her, Queen Numbi was helped out of her hut and saw the bright light illuminating the whole area. She knew exactly what to do.

Slowly the Queen made her way across the field and made her way towards the glowing ball. As her people watched, she got closer and closer before being swallowed up by the light. In the light, the people could see shapes. They could make out small, strange beings with large heads welcoming Queen Numbi. After several hours Queen Numbi was seen to emerge from the sphere. As she walked towards her people, they saw that she had not only been healed, but also appeared much younger! The star stayed on the ground for several days before it slowly rose back into the air and disappeared from view. It is said by the Shangaan people that it was from that day that strange things were noticed in the area. Cattke were born with two heads, antelope were born with deformed limbs and lion, leopard and impala wee born with snow white fur and green blue eyes.

African tribal elders call the White Lions the “Sons of the Sun God” and are revered as the most sacred animal. They are seen as messengers of the gods and represent balance and order. Some say that when the White Lions are born, the earth is about to undergo massive changes.

Invocation for the Coming of The Age of Aquarius and Leo

In the name of our I AM self, we call to beloved St. Germain and the violet flame to usher in the coming of the Age of Aquarius and Leo, to free us in every way to ascend as a planet and a people into a higher consciousness of harmony, peace and enlightenment. Clear any negative connotations of this astrological configuration and bring forth the full manifestation of Freedom's star and our victory in the light.

Teaching: Many spiritual traditions have established a notion that the alignment of the North Pole with celestial constellations determines eras or ages that govern life on our planet. The North Pole points toward a particular constellation for a period of approximately 2,150 years. Currently, this northern axis is shifting, gradually moving away from the constellation of Pisces toward the constellation of Aquarius—hence the commonly referred to Age of Aquarius.

Naturally, as the North axis starts to point toward Aquarius, its exact opposite, the South Pole axis shifts toward the opposite constellation, Leo. In astrology Aquarius is the sign representing humans and civilization. In other words, the constellation of humans (Aquarius) is exactly opposing the constellation of lions (Leo). From this perspective, we again see humans and lions symbolically unified as an indivisible pair—and more conspicuously these are the constellations where both poles of the planet are now moving. We cannot help but notice the synchronistic manifestation of White Lions in the Southern Hemisphere at the time when the South Pole begins to point toward the constellation of Leo.

Violet Flame I AM MORE DECREE

Invocation for Universal Balance

In the name I Am that I AM, we invoke the light of the violet flame and all the seven rays of God to bring forth balance and oneness with the four races of the earth, of black, brown, red, and white, and transmute all divisiveness that prevents us from becoming unified in the light.

Teaching: The White Lion prophecy corresponds with the beliefs of other ancient cultures throughout the world, including the Native American tribes of North America. The Global White Lion Protection Trust (WLT)'s advisory council includes indigenous elders from other cultures and continents. One of the WLT advisors, High Chief Francois Paulette of the native Canadian Dene people, speaks of the time when according to a Native American prophecy a white bison calf will stand on Mother Earth. The white bison will have black eyes, black hooves, and a black nose (i.e. not an albino) and will come to deliver a warning that humanity is at a crossroads. Humankind will face chaos, disease, and destruction unless we unite spiritually. Like the White Lions of Africa, the White Buffalos of America are an icon of love and light, uniting nations at a time when peace urgently needs to be restored on earth.

Mantra:

Four races united, we are all one
Peace is restored, balance has come (7x)
